1 European Integration reflects both the telos and ethos for which the European 'construct'—the various European Communities and the extant European Union—were established. Part of that telos and ethos are reflected in the particular 'method' adopted by the architects of the process. In this entry the focus will be on those features rather than the institutional set up or material economic provisions of the European Union and its constituent Treaties. Deciphering the political and juridical codes of Europe is the key to an understanding of European Integration...
